Real or Imagined.....There is no 'definitive' proof of reality; we rely on our senses and what we know as objective evidence to be 'real'. While our thoughts do not directly create the physical world around us, they do have the power to influence and shape our individual realities. As humans, we are capable of manifesting many things into creation and our perceptions are uniquely our own; particularly artists (of any medium), remain the power-houses behind ferrying the imaginary into states of reality or reversing realities toward the surreal. We want to see works of art that play with the concept of what is real or imagined, and perhaps what lurks in between. The way these 'states' can be conveyed is limitless and might be demonstrated through something as simplistic as the study of a still life, to a complex life event translated into a mysterious riddle.
